II. Document-Based Essay

This essay is worth 10 points.

Using these documents and what you have learned about the revolutions in Latin America, write an extended explanation (one to three paragraphs) on how popular leaders rallied people to revolt, and what the effects of these efforts were. You may write your extended writing piece as either a single long analytic paragraph or as a short three-paragraph essay. Regardless of your format, be sure that your writing has an introduction, a body, and a conclusion.

Consider that leaders used a variety of emotions — such as fear and hope — to rally people.

There are three types of persuasion: ~~ethos~~ ethos, logos, and pathos. Through pathos revolutionary leaders are able to unite people from many different backgrounds for a cause. For example, Hidalgo used religion, a very emotional part of many cultures, to unite the people of Mexico for revolution. By exploiting very specific emotions, such as hope and fear, leaders are capable to move large numbers of people in very specific ways. For example, by giving people hope, Bolívar was able to turn a revolt into a movement.

The revolts created a better life for the people. The success of one revolt often triggered similar revolts in nearby countries. ~~By~~ By ~~explaining~~ fueling revolts with emotions, leaders successfully ensuring consistent engagement ~~and~~ with and participation by the people.
